Marty is an Associate in the firm's Litigation Practice Group, advising clients from our Portland office. He counsels individuals and companies on a diverse range of matters at all stages of litigation, from case initiation to discovery and deposition preparation, trial, and appellate advocacy. His practice offers clients broad experience in class-action, antitrust, securities and white collar defense, and civil rights issues, including the First Amendment.

Marty is a graduate of Princeton University and the University of Michigan Law School, where he served as contributing editor for the Michigan Law Review. Marty has an extensive background in government service, including internships with the U.S. Attorney's Office in Concord, New Hampshire and the U.S. Department of State's Bureau of Legislative Affairs in Washington, D.C. Before attending law school, Marty served for three years as an Intelligence Analyst with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, where he worked on criminal and national-security matters.

Prior to joining Preti Flaherty, Marty was a law clerk for the Hon. Jeffrey R. Howard, Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, and was a litigation associate at a top firm in Boston.

Marty lives in Scarborough with his wife.
